The Instructor will announce the modes of evaluation and distribution of weightage for each of the assessment at the beginning of the course. Various modes of assessment used for rating students' performance in a theory course include quizzes, class tests, home assignments, group assignments, viva voce, and end-semester examination. Makeup for any absence from in-semester evaluations like midsem/tests/quizzes will be at the discretion of the Instructor. Instructors need to be convinced that the reasons for absence are genuine. The assessment in a laboratory course will be based on turn-to-turn supervision of the student's work, her/his performance in viva-voce examinations and group discussions, the quality of their work as prescribed through laboratory journals and an end-semester test that contains an experiment or a written examination. Projects are supervised, and need regular interaction (at least once a week) with the supervisor. Student has to submit a project report and defend it in front of a panel of examiners, upon which the final grade is awarded. The dates for submission of reports, the dates for presentations, and details of mode of assessment are decided by the individual departments. Sufficient care is taken while evaluation of answer scripts. Any re-evaluation of evaluated answer scripts before the grade submission is at the discretion of the instructor. The instructor will allow students to see the evaluated answer scripts before finalization of grades. The instructor is expected to preserve the evaluated answer scripts for one additional semester.
